Preface

Sanskrit has been the principal culture-bearing language of India for more than three millennia. The manuscripts in Sanskrit number one hundred times those in Greek and Latin combined. Yet despite the abundance of Sanskrit literature, there has been a dearth of material available for instruction besides introductory textbooks. Charles Lanman's A Sanskrit Reader, published in 1884, and Macdonell's A Vedic Reader for Students, published in 1917, have remained virtually without companion to the present day. In order to contribute to instruction in the Sanskrit language, the present volume presents a fully annotated edition of the Rāmopākhyāna. In doing so, it opens this Sanskrit text of the classic story of Rāma to a wider audience as a contribution to broadening the enjoyment and understanding of the literature and culture of India.

Interpret the locative absolute evam hṛtāyām kṛṣṇāyām causally. prāpya...akurvata: The absolutive prāpya designates the action of attaining which precedes the action of doing, performed by the same agent, denoted by the principal verb akurvata. The direct object of obtaining is affliction denoted by kleśa. Sanskrit often describes what English articulates as becoming characterized by an emotion, 'became severely afflicted,' as going to a state, 'attained unsurpassed affliction.' The absolutive prāpya has been interpreted temporally because of the phrase ata ūrdhvam 'after this' in the main clause.

Janamejaya said:

After they became severely afflicted because Kṛṣṇā had been abducted in this way, what did the tiger-like sons of Pāṇḍu do next?

āśritah, a past passive participle in form, is active here denoting the agent Rāma and governing sugrīvabalam as its direct object.

Rāma took her back having resorted to the army of Sugrīva, after building a bridge over the ocean and burning Laṅkā with sharp arrows.
